The Big Island's Calley O'Neill is a highly respected visionary conservation and cultural artist/designer, and muralist with a long term and broad range of creative and educational experience. Journalists have described O'Neill as a 'force of nature', a 'wayfinder', a 'positive force', and her art as 'ethno-visionary', 'dynamic', 'leading edge', and 'breathtaking', with a 'crystalline mastery of glaze painting'. Her art, which spans more than four decades, finds its expression primarily in large, provocative interspecies wildlife thangka paintings and public stained glass mosaic murals honoring the Hawaiian people and ancestral wisdom. Her art speaks to human evolution, transformation, healing, and the active conservation of nature.

EDUCATION

1979: MA, SOCIAL ECOLOGY, GODDARD COLLEGE, PLAINFIELD, VT. At Goddard, Calley was strongly influenced by the earliest pioneers of ecological design and restoration, sustainability, and the green energy revolution. She spent time with the most brilliant thinkers of the day, who initiated the research and created the models for energy, food, and water systems at the New Alchemy Institute, Goddard's Cate Farm, the Rocky Mountain Institute, Farallon Institute, and the Integral Urban House. In essence, they applied biological science to technology.

1974: BFA, SUMMA CUM LAUDE, PRATT INSTITUTE, NEW YORK
